Letter from the Founder

With three years of experience in Gamma Talks, I have observed a fluctuating yet very interactive organisation. We've had the opportunity to communicate with writers and editors across India, and some even internationally. With the support of readers, members and our core team, we were able to have made over 200 articles in the span of three years! But we now believe it is time to change.

Gamma's main reason for this transition is to promote healthy and data-based research for those students who are passionate about Economics and Society. As a heavily populated country, it becomes the responsibility of individuals to analyse the true worth of the Indian workforce, and take measures to raise these very standards. With the occupational structure of Indians being diverse, I believe research is the very first step in the process of change.

As a passionate researcher myself, I seek to build a society that consists of passionate and dedicated students who want to gain hands-on experience in undertaking mini-research projects under one common domain, to accumulate information that helps us achieve our very goal: comprehending the power and ability of the Indian workforce to drive the economy forward. Together, we will one day make the workforce, and here's to the efforts we can make right now in analyzing its credibility.
